3.

- (a) The 82-mm and the 120-mm mortars did participate in artillery preparations
- (b) 82-mm and 120-mm mortars were emplaced one to three km behind the infantry.
- (c) the forward observer system and communications system for mortar units are the same as that used by the artillery. Each unit commander is the forward observer for his unit and has with him from one to three officers, two radio men, two telephone men, two reconnaissance men and two messengers. The unit commander directs the missions to be fired by radio or telephone.

57-mm guns are at all times (assault, combat in depth, pursuit) with the infantry (usually on flanks of infantry) and have the mission of protecting the infantry from tanks. They do not participate in artillery preparation unless an enemy tank threat exists.

The Division Commander selects departure position and assembly areas in accordance with terrain, time on hand before the attack. camouflage possibility. etc.

Command posts of all levels of command (div, regt, bn, and co) are located as far forward toward the front lines as possible. Unit commanders act as FO for their units, observe effects of fire and direct the progress of battle from this position. Personnel making up the various level command posts are as follows:

- (a) The Division Command Post is composed of the Div Commander, Deputy Commander, Deputy for Artillery, one Ron officer, two to three radiomen, two to three telephone men, two to three ron men, and two to three messengers.
- (b) The Regiment Command Post is composed of the Regt Commander, Deputy Commander, Deputy for Artillery, one Ren officer, two radiomen, two telephone men, two ren men and two messengers.

A mortar FO can radio or telephone to the Deputy for Artillery at regt or division level, who will, if he considers it necessary, order artillery fire on the target pointed out by the mortar FO.

10.

57-mm AT guns organic to an infantry bn are controlled by the battalion. Regimental AT guns are under centralized regimental control even when supporting battalions.

11.

All field and AAA guns are used as AT guns if the necessity arises. The overall unit commander (an infantry officer), with the assistance of the Deputy for Artillery, organizes and coordinate AT defenses. Artillery fires in a direct fire role only when directed to do so by the Deputy for Artillery.
